

In the bag!

Following the successful launch of its peat-free compost last year and, determined to get greener by the minute, the National Trust launched its new range of peat-free composts at the horticultural trade show GLEE in September. The composts are made for Enterprises by Petersfield Growing Mediums in Leicester and, to mark the event, they commissioned Gloucestershire-based artist Shelly Campbell to design special outfits made from the compost bags to wear on press day at the show. These were modelled by two National Trust Careership trainee gardeners, who are shown here. They are Lizzie Baxendale from Beningbrough Hall (left) and Stephanie Archer from Trengwainton.

A percentage from sales of the compost will go directly to the Trust to help maintain its gardens.
